THE MYTH

The word "myth" is derived from the Greek word "muthos," which refers to anything transmitted orally.

A myth is a traditional story, especially one referring to a people's early past or explaining natural or social phenomena, and it typically involves supernatural entities and occurrences.

Myths are stories that imaginatively and symbolically recount the complete and fundamental structures of a culture.

Myths are frequently presented as facts. The audience believed these stories because they provided sensible answers.

The setting of the story is typically ancient and set in a world very similar to our own, but with supernatural beings.

CHARACTERISTICS OF A MYTH

Myths teach individuals how to conduct and live in accordance with the culture's fundamental values and beliefs.

Myths contain an account of how something came to exist in the world, and most myths involve gods with superpowers.

THE LEGEND

The word "legend" is derived from Medieval Latin "legenda," which means "things to be read," and from Latin "legere," meaning "read."

A legend usually includes an element of truth, or is based on historic facts but with "mythical qualities."

The spiritual beliefs of the culture from which a legend originates are frequently included in stories, which typically involve heroic figures or fantastical locales.

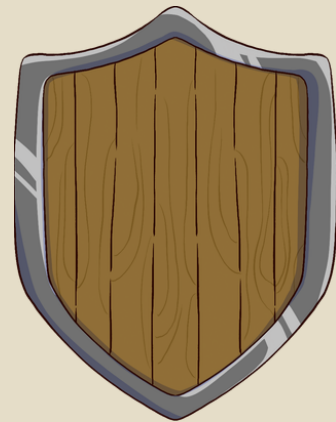

Legends change with time. Facts will be altered or exaggerated, and vivid details will remain and/or become more or less vivid.

There is a definite time and place in legends. They frequently involve cultural beliefs and concepts.

CHARACTERISTICS OF A LEGEND

Legends are stories of human actions that are believed by the storyteller and the audience to have taken place in actual history.

Legends are written in such a way as to be at least potentially true; they change with time and remain new, vibrant, and interesting.
